Like our home, The Royal Exchange, Gin has a storied history in London. In the late 17th century, to starve France of British coin from its Brandy exports, the production and consumption of English Gin was widely encouraged. The monopoly held by the London Guild of Distillers was broken, the requirement for a license to distil Gin was dropped and taxes on distilleries were reduced.

The result was the Gin Craze of the early 18th century, where it became the tippie of choice for the masses. The libertine spirit ingrained in the public by Gin was frowned upon by stuffy magistrates who labelled it a 'pernicious liquor' and enacted a series of laws known as 'The Gin Acts' to reduce consumption and production. But the people's passion for Gin could not be quelled, with civil disobedience in response to the laws and soon, by the 19th Century, gin was once again on the rise as 'Gin Palaces' sprang up across Britain. Even in modern times, Gin is the spirit of choice for the UK.

The Libertine London Dry Gin brings together the rich history of London and The Royal Exchange. With notes of juniper, fresh coriander and warming spices, The Libertine London Dry Gin is a nod to the worldly ingredients once housed in the vaults where The Libertine now sits.
